This is looking up from the bottom. If I remove the shocks and let the swingarm down it will hit the exhaust.

I pry the mufflers out and stick a box end wrench in between the hanger and muffler to shim it out away from the swingarm slightly

Pry the top of the shock off the frame stud. It helps to take some of the weight off the wheel so it isn't under pressure and will come off easier.

Once the shocks are off check the shock bushings for wear. These gone bad can make for a squirrely ride in the curves. These look good

Then I loosen the top driveshaft housing nuts. I don't remove them just loosen them so they still have a few threads left before coming off

Then I raise the bike so the tire is just barely setting on the floor and remove the axle nut.

Sometimes you have to hold the other side with an Allen wrench to keep it from spinning.

To slide the axle out it helps to play with the weight bearing on the floor so the axle isn't binding and will slide right out. You can start the nut back on and tap it lightly to get it started then remove the nut

Remove the spacer so it don't fall out while moving the wheel around and roll off somewhere.

Seperate the driveshaft from the final drive by giving it a quick jerk out. Sometimes it's a little tough to get out but it will come. Push it in all the way then jerk out on it.

This is the pinion cup, looks pretty good almost too much grease causing the holes to be plugged in the bottom but not bad.

Then pull the u joint up out of the hole. You may need to slightly lower the swingarm to clear enough for it to come out but it will to come out
