Got the wheel off and notice quite a bit of grease leaking out around the splines. My first thought was the last guy didn't change the 3 o rings?

Trying to work it back and forth to see if there is any wear or movement in the wheel dampers. These are really tight

Pins where really dry and hard to get the drive flange off. The pins seat into the wheel dampners to cushion the jerk on and off the throttle. The dampners are about $35 for new ones and very easy to change but these are really good

The thrush washer is here and need to be sure it goes back on, if it shows wear replace it. I do mine every other tire change.

The first of 3 o rings goes here, it is the thinnest of the 3. Remove the old clean the groove real good apply a little grease and put the new one on

Pull the spacer out, one end is belled and the other is not. The small end goes in the hole 1st

Here's the reason I believe for all the grease leaked out of the drive flange. The o ring is all the way at the bottom of the splines and it should be at the top in the groove. There was nothing in the top groove and after searching found it in the bottom

Clean up the splines on the drive flange real good. These splines look really good but the bike only has 16,000 miles on it.

After pulling the driveshaft out of the final drive I inspect the shaft and pinion cup splines.

All 3 holes, there is one on the side of the cup you can't access unless you remove the cup

I pour the gear oil out of the final drive into the funnel to completely drain it.

Pretty dirty just a few little metal particals, the last guy definitely didn't change this when he just serviced it. I'd bet this is the original factory oil

Can't let these stay on there. Friends don't let friends ride on OEM stems.
